Understanding the Code of Practice for the Care and Handling of Bison

The Codes of Practice are nationally developed guidelines that serve as an understanding of animal care. They outline requirements and recommended practices around animal environment, feed and water, animal health, herd management, handling, transportation, and on-farm euthanasia. They also promote sound management and welfare practices for housing, care, transportation and other animal husbandry practices.

In 2017, the Canadian Bison Association and the National Farm Animal Care Council (NFACC) released The Code of Practice for the Care and Handling of Bison. It was developed with respect for and an understanding of the wild nature of bison, and reflects available scientific research. Updates to the bison code included input from representatives of all affected stakeholders.

The code is available online at <http://www.nfacc.ca/>.

Performance = Pounds This is not a hobby!

It's serious business here at Jumpoff Buffalo Ranch. Performance in our cow herd, performance in our bull battery and performance in our feeder animals are top priorities. In today's market, every pound matters and we have the proven genetics to put pounds on your animals.

We cull based on performance. Cows are expected to perform and second calf heifers get one free pass into the herd and must produce calves after that.

In December of 2017, our bull calves averaged 504 pounds at weaning and our heifer calves averaged 466 pounds.

Make Jumpoff Buffalo Ranch your source for proven performance that will put dollars in your pocket.

Canadian Prairie Bison

Quality is in our nature.

Thank you to
Canadian Prairie Bison
for the continued support

Canadian bison meat products offer high quality and safety standards.

Raising bison has another great advantage—it's sustainable. Nearly all the animals' nutritional needs can be met by grazing on perennial grasses that grow naturally across Canada. Agricultural inputs are therefore very small, and the herds themselves have a minimal effect on the natural environment.

For health-conscious consumers – and for chefs demanding the very best in grade and taste – there's nothing better than Canadian Prairie Bison. Ranch-raised and grain-fed.

As producers, we take pride in our herds in their natural environment, and in the confidence we bring to your table. Use our bison in any of your favorite meat dishes – and savor the difference!
